Lancashire was probably built by William Haddaway circa 1783 on land patented to his great-grandfather in 1678. The property has never been sold out of the family, and is now in the tenth generation of ownership. The old section of the house is a 1½ story structure of brick laid in Flemish bond on the two primary facades and common bond on the gable ends. It has yellow pine flooring and some original 18th century paneling in the parlor. The 1798 federal tax assessment describes the house as having an attached log kitchen. The present frame section of the house was added in the 20th century. Near the house are a frame dairy built in the second quarter of the 19th century and an ancient family burial ground.

Lancashire is the setting for many of the stories related in General Joseph B. Seth's Recollections; General Seth was born and raised on this farm.
